“ Shawn, you are free to run and jump and yell and spread your WINGS. We rejoice knowing you are free from pain, your wheelchair and being trapped inside your beautiful body that could not get you to places we wished for you. I loved you dearly, and when you moved to your dorm...it broke my heart. I love you and thank PonyBird for giving my son such a wonderful home and lots of entertainment. God has plans for you, and please be waiting for me when I leave this place. Rest in Peach my little precious boy.

“ Alicia was the first pre-teen little girl that I had the pleasure of knowing well. She was dynamic in every way. She loved her sister and brother and also loved to torment them. She was bright and witty, smart and so dog gone cute. I remember painting the bedroom downstairs at Finchdale and having her come in, look at it and tell me how I could do it better. When asked if she wanted to do it herself, she told me that I needed someone to watch what I was doing more so she just couldn't help. :) My love and prayers to the family in your time of sorrow.

Darrell & Linda Peters - May 28, 2009 at 12:00 AM

“ He who understands the conditions of Life does not strive after what is of no use to life; and he who understands the conditions of Destiny does not strive after what is beyond the reach of knowledge. In nourishing the body it is necessary to have beforehand the things to support it; but there are cases where there is a superabundance of such things, and yet the body is not nourished. In order to have life it is necessary that it has not left the body; but there are cases when the body has not been left by it, and yet the life has perished. When life comes, it cannot be declined; when it goes, it cannot be detained. You think that to nourish the body is sufficient to preserve life; and when such nourishment is not sufficient to preserve the life, what can be done in the world that will be sufficient? Though (all that men can do) will be insufficient, yet there are things which they feel they ought to do, and they do not try to avoid doing them. For those who wish to avoid caring for the body, their best plan is to abandon the world. Abandoning the world, they are free from its entanglements. Free from its entanglements, their (minds) are correct and their (temperament) is equable. Thus correct and equable, they succeed in securing a renewal of life, as some have done. But how is it sufficient to abandon worldly affairs? How is it sufficient to forget the business of life? Through the renouncing of (worldly) affairs, the body has no more toil; through forgetting the business of life, the vital power suffers no diminution. When the body is completed and the vital power is restored (to its original vigor), man is one with Heaven. Heaven and Earth are the father and mother of all things. It is by their union that the body is formed; it is by their separation that a (new) beginning is brought about. When the body and vital power suffer no diminution, we have what may be called the transference of power. From the vital force there comes another more vital, and man returns to be the assistant of Heaven.

Our life between heaven and earth is like a white colt passing a crevice, and suddenly disappearing. As with a plunge and an effort they all come forth; easily and quietly they all enter again. By a transformation they live, and by another transformation they die.

Living things are made sad (by death), and mankind grieve for it; but it is only the removal of the bow from its sheath, the emptying natural satchel of its contents. There may be some confusion amidst the yielding to the change; but the intellectual and animal souls are taking their leave, and the body will follow them: This is the Great Returning home. That the bodily frame came from incorporeity, and will return to the same.

In the Grand Beginning (of all things) there was nothing in all the vacancy of space; there was nothing that could be named. It was in this state that there arose the first existence, but still without bodily shape. That which had no shape was divided; and then there were produced the distinguishing lines of each, which we call the bodily shape. That shape was the body preserving in it the spirit, and each had its peculiar manifestation, which we call its Nature. When the Nature has been cultivated, it returns to its proper character; and when that has been fully reached, there is the same condition as at the Beginning. That sameness is pure vacancy, and the vacancy is great. It is like the closing of the beak and silencing the singing (of a bird). That closing and silencing is like the union of heaven and earth (at the beginning). The union, effected, as it is, might seem to indicate stupidity or darkness, but it is what we call the "mysterious quality" (existing at the beginning); it is the same as the Great Returning home.

Therefore all things go through one and the same experience. (Life) is accounted beautiful because it is spirit-like and wonderful, and death is accounted ugly because of its feter and putridity. But the fetid and putrid is transformed again into the spirit-like and wonderful, and the spirit-like and wonderful is transformed again into the fetid and putrid. Hence it is said, "All under the sky there is one breath of life, and therefore the sages prized that unity.""

Life is the follower of death, and death is the predecessor of life; but who knows the Arranger (of this connection between them)? The life is due to the collecting of the breath. When that is collected, there is life; when it is dispersed, there is death. Since death and life thus attend on each other, why should I account (either of) them an evil? Blowing and breathing with open mouth; inhaling and exhaling the breath; expelling the old breath and taking in new; passing their time like the (dormant) bear, and stretching and twisting (the neck) like a bird;-- all this simply shows the desire for longevity. This is what the scholars who manipulate their breath, and the men who nourish the body and wish to live long are fond of.

Things indeed die and are born, not reaching a perfect state which can be relied on. Now there is emptiness, and now fullness;-- they do not continue in one form. The years cannot be reproduced; time cannot be arrested. Decay and growth, fullness and emptiness, when they end, begin again. It is thus that we describe the method of great righteousness, and discourse about the principle pervading all things. The life of things is like the hurrying and galloping along of a horse. With every movement there is a change; with every moment there is an alteration. What should you be doing? what should you not be doing? You have only to be allowing this course of natural transformation to be going on.

"Your body is not your own to hold; "It is the bodily form entrusted to you by Heaven and Earth. Life is not yours to hold. It is the blended harmony entrusted to you by Heaven and Earth. Your nature, constituted as it is, is not yours to hold. It is entrusted to you by Heaven and Earth to act in accordance with it. Your grandsons and sons are not yours to hold. They are the exuviae entrusted to you by Heaven and Earth. Therefore when we walk, we should not know where we are going; when we stop and rest, we should not know what to occupy ourselves with when we eat, we should not know the taste of our food;-- all is done by the strong influence of Heaven and Earth. Death and life are ordained, just as we have the constant succession of night and day;-- in both cases from Heaven. Men have no power to do anything in reference to them;-- such is the constitution of things. the truth that there is no difference between) life and death;-- the destruction of life is not dying, and the communication of other life is not living. It is a thing which accompanies all other things and meets them, which is present when they are overthrown and when they obtain their completion. Its name is Tranquility amid all Disturbances, meaning that such Disturbances lead to Its Perfection.

Therefore it is (also) said, "The life is the action of Heaven; and death is the transformation common to (all) things.

Therefore it is said (still further), "If the body be toiled, and does not rest, it becomes worn out; if the spirit be used without cessation, it becomes toiled; and when toiled, it becomes exhausted. It is the nature of water, when free from admixture, to be clear, and, when not agitated, to be level; while if obstructed and not allowed to flow, it cannot preserve its clearness;-- being an image of the virtue of Heaven." Hence it is said (once again), "To be guileless and pure, and free from all admixture; to be still and uniform, without undergoing any change; to be indifferent and do nothing; to move and yet to act like Heaven:-- this is the way to nourish the spirit. Human spirit goes forth in all directions, flowing on without limit, reaching to heaven above, and wreathing round the earth beneath. It transforms and nourishes all things, and cannot be represented by any form. Its name is "the Divinity (in man)." It is only the path of pure simplicity which guards and preserves the Spirit. When this path is preserved and not lost, it becomes one with the Spirit; and in this ethereal amalgamation, it acts in harmony with the orderly operation of Heaven.
