She met the love of her life, Yurka as she affectionately called him, at engineering college. The two were inseparable over their nearly 60 years of marriage. The strength of this bond is evident in the success of their children and grandchildren, for whom Inna left her beloved Moscow. Even in her final years Inna was able to make those around her laugh and built many friendships at her nursing home, in spite of never learning English. Inna was an idealist, she only saw the good in humanity, and this innate happiness radiated throughout her to all those that met her. She will be fondly remembered and dearly missed by all who knew and loved her.
